Uric acid gave positive results. The reactivity of ammonium molybdate in this respect is too general to be of value as a differential test. The study is in progress. 173. Autolysis and nuclear relations. Max Morse. (Dep t of Physiol., Univ. of Wis., Madison.) There is a more or less direct relation between the character of an organ with respect to its nuclear content, from the histological standpoint, and its rate of autolysis, whereby those organs in which there are relatively greater masses of nuclei to that of matrices (cytoplasm, interstitial substance, protoplasmic differentiation in the form of fibres, etc.), such as glands, show greater rates of Salkowskian autolysis. Accordingly, the hypothesis might be formulated that some connection exists between the distinctive chemical component, nucleic acid, and the rate of tissue-enzyme action. This hypothesis was tested by 27 Miller and Taylor: Jour. Biol. Chetn., 1914, xvii, p. 531. adding given amounts of liver, spleen and thymus nucleic acid<sup>28</sup> to pig liver brei, and following the rate of autolysis by estimations of total nitrogen on tannic acid nltrates. As the accompanying table shows, there was no apparent modification of rate of enzyme action. Doubtless the relation between nuclear component and rate of autolysis concerns the activity of organs which are relatively richer in nuclei, such organs being in a more active state, metabolically....
