Many organizations and individuals are interested in care coordination, particularly as it relates to concerns about inefficiencies and suboptimal quality in the U. S. health care system. The Institute of Medicine identified care coordination as one of 20 national priorities for action to improve quality along its six dimensions of making care safe, effective, patient centered, timely, efficient, and equitable. The burgeoning number of aging Americans with chronic illnesses and the increasing complexity of care create challenges to coordination experienced at every level the patient, the clinical practice, and the system. Care coordination interventions are particularly attractive in that they have the potential to improve both efficiency and quality. This final Evidence Report in the series Closing the Quality Gap by the Stanford-UCSF Evidence-based Practice Center addresses the topic of care coordination. This report describes our working definition of care coordination, summarizes some of the evidence about the effectiveness of care coordination interventions from systematic reviews, and presents relevant frameworks for the development and evaluation of future interventions. This approach may be useful to system-level policymakers, service-level decisionmakers, and patients. System-level policymakers have responsibility for paying for health care services for large numbers of individuals and making decisions about how to coordinate care at a system level in ways that minimize their financial risks and maximize the health care received by their population of patients. Service-level decisionmakers are involved in providing health care services to individual patients or a panel of patients, and therefore tackle care coordination at the service delivery level. Depending upon the particular local environment, they make decisions related to care coordination to maximize health care outcomes and use resources efficiently. Patients and their families are assuming increasingly active...
