Excerpt: .when he enters Reading Gaol, the bath he must take is one in which the water has already served for the ablutions of ten of his fellow-convicts. Belonging to a privileged, a delicately nurtured class, his shudder at this enforced contact with the crowd is the shudder of the aristocrat compelled to rub shoulders with the canaille. Dostoevsky, however, the new man who rises superior to class distinctions, feels delight instead of repulsion at having thus to mingle with the masses. For him, the dirty bathwater becomes a purgatorial fire for the cleansing of his soul from pride. When he helps a Tatar to wash, he thrills ecstatically, for in imagination he participates in the Christian mystery of the washing of feet. Wilde, for whom to be a gentleman is something more than to be a man, fears lest his fellow-prisoners may take him...
