Of those who have done this, some have held that the human act can only take place through Divine help; but they have agreed with the others in making all hope wait on the human act, and in rigidly defining what the act must be, in defiance of all differences in understanding, in opportunities, and in points of view. Often the human act, as they have defined it, has been made to involve blindness to the glory of the Divine Presence, and denial of the unchanging care and love. Oh, how they have tormented us in this! As for the initial barrier, our unworthiness, half of what they say would sink us in tribulation over our sin and misery, even if we were not already impressed with it. But they leave us with our helplessness. They do this by assuring us that the only hope of escape for all eternity is in an act of our own, to be performed in this brief, feeble stage of life. They see not God above all, and they forbid us to see Him. They would rob us of the assurance conveyed by His voice continually, that He loves us as we are, feeble as we are. They see ourselves only, and project the life of God into the unknown. From the dread amazement which their doctrine induces, the refuge for every one is in the Brightness of Goodness that is in...
